To Chicago-based artist Patrick Fitzgerald, his sculptures are a means of traveling through time. Working from found materials, Fitzgerald constructs miniature soap box cars and the branded attire of their imagined drivers. Futuristic forms imbued with history, each sculpture is an exercise in imagining the future through the lens of the past – or vice versa.

Born from a fascination with the soap box derbies of his youth, Fitzgerald builds each sculpture from found materials collected over the years, layered with personal memories and keepsakes from the past. The jackets are finished with designs culled from an old 1945 industrial directory, a nod to the small business sponsorship of box car racing.
